Source: Activation of the alpha1beta1-subunit of human luteinizing hormone receptor confers estrogen-independent cell growth. Human luteinizing hormone receptor (hLHR) is a member of the rhodopsin family of G protein-coupled receptors. The hLHR alpha1beta1-subunit is a potent transducer of hLHR signaling. We have previously reported that estrogen induces cell growth of estrogen receptor-negative (ER-): breast cancer cells through functional activation of hLHR. This study was aimed at elucidating the molecular nature of this growth response. We demonstrate that alpha1-subunit was expressed in breast cancer cells in these ER-: cells. Treatment of ER-: cells with estrogens led to the recruitment of chaperone proteins to alpha1, suggesting that estrogen induces cell growth via alpha1 receptor. Interestingly, cell growth was abolished in alpha1beta1-transfected ER-: cells as a result of complete desensitization of these cells to estrogenic stimulation, even in the presence of estrogens, indicating that functional activation of alpha1beta1 is essential for hLHR signaling. Furthermore, both ligand stimulation and basal activation of alpha
